* - reasonably accurate numbers from 2007 World Almanac and Wikipedia. There are occasional and small shifts during a Congress - somebody dies or resigns. Only rarely are there members of other parties in Congress, usually these are people who call themselves Independents.

The "sausage making" aspect of law-making is well known. Bush II was the closest we ever came to an imperial Presidency that considered itself sole and supreme authority, essentially ignoring other branches of government. The era of Republican dominance of the U.S. Government was 1995 through 2008. Even today Republican threat of filibuster in the Senate means that it is difficult for the Democrats to attain the 60 votes needed to pass bills to their specifications. And this makes an assumption that all Democrats are ideologically the same, which they are not.

 - Rush Limbaugh was lionized as a hero by the Republicans for his talk-radio role in overturning Congress in the 1994 elections. One of his own listeners, an apparently conservative Republican, caught Rush unawares and lambasted him on the air yesterday.
